The pursuit of an artist is to create the stress is not the medium anymore but the process which he derives his conclusion which compels him make a thing. He wants to make something which did not exist before. His reality which may not be a real object or skillful nor just a piece of decoration. He s not interested to prove he s clever but his character or object is what he feels to be more real than the shoddy object which exists around you.

Many artist are in agreement with Sigmund Freud, who had shown that when our wakening thought are numbered the child and savings in us take over. The ancients spoke of poetry as a kind of 'divine madness', and Romantic writers like Coleridge and De Quincey experiment with opium.

This eclectic group of artist have captured there feeling of strangeness in their works.
